into the Ice Age Hall of Fame, taking the 500-Mile Award for completing their tenth consecutive Ice Age - what memories must be stored! The race had once been a local club event, yet the 1991 version of the Dairyland State's premier ultra showed trappings of its bigger counterparts. New rules included noaccess areas for crews, and the threat of being banned from Ice Age for life for not reporting a DNF.

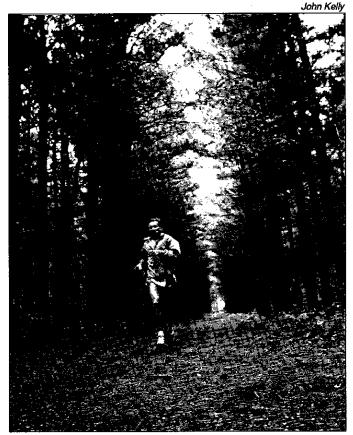

The South Kettle Moraine State Park offers the finest in terrain. It could be labeled "user friendly," a great firsttime trail ultra (but only to those who haven't hit the slopes of other greats like Mountain Masochist in Virginia). Some complained of the new section which circumvented the infamous "dump" of previous years, chattering about the added hills. These quick rises peaked in a few hundred yards, and then threw us into some beautiful high country, complete with nature markers for those who had time to identify the nearby foliage.

Yes, it was a bit hard to read the signs with water dripping from the brim of your cap. It again poured throughout the second half of this year's event. For me (a 10:14 finisher) that meant getting just two minutes past the start/halfway/finish area. It was nothing like last year's blow-out, but the same ankle-sucking mud crept out to visit once again. On the hills, one had to forage into the woods and grab for trees and brush iust to control momentum in the muck.

The Ice Age race is a series of out-andbacks, which gives us back-of-the-packers a front row seat to the leaders that even payper-view couldn't provide. It's a humbling experience watching these front runners forge ahead. Some are working like it's the last stretch of a track meet, while others are flowing seemingly in between the rain drops.

Clement Grum and Kevin Setnes, the eventual first- and second-place finishers, were matching pace through the early going, but a clue to Grum's stamina was evident. In the early going Setnes was pushing hard and leading, while Grum was staying in his tracks while unwrapping a PowerBar! This isn't to say that all was effortless for Clement. During the final stages he took the lead, but was slowing trudging up the muddy hills in the same manner as his lessthan-prepared counterparts.

I've run five 50-mile runs, and this year's Ice Age was my slowest ever. That would have bothered me, but once again the essence of ultras is what you make of the journey. I hooked up with a convoy of Canadians around mile 35, and learned all about Canadian versus American taxation. Another new friend kept telling me he was too old for ultras, but we decided that since neither of us like golf, we'd probably see each other at Ice Age another time. And the female who beat me to the finish will only be remembered by her number — "21." Her upbeat spirit over the final miles was a big part of keeping it together for yet another buckle.

One of my trail friends of the day said it best: "It's just a day in your life. We can't always plan how it will turn out. Take the finish, and enjoy it."

You Ran 50 Miles For a Buckle?

When asked the question, "Was that your goal?

Why waste all that time to run so far?"
Do you show your heart, expose your soul?
Or toss out a line 'bout time in a car?

Running in search of your personal grail, But a DNF, won't quench the fire! Hard to describe the hours on the trail, Slogging through endless miles of mire.

The race involves your eternal quest,
To peel the layers and look inside.
At the finish, can you again rest,
The truth, once found, can no longer hide.
The buckle is the material award,
Knowledge of self is the real reward!
